

Acknowledgments

At crucial points in the planning and drafting of this book, busy people who didn't owe us anything gave us the precious gift of their time and attention. Lee Odell of Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute listened to us and encouraged us at convention hotels over several years. He also reviewed the manuscript, helping us especially with consistency and organization. Carol Berkenkotter of Michigan Technological University, rooming with some of us at a convention, spent, literally, days and nights questioning, challenging, and supporting us. Later, she read the manuscript and helped us especially with our research theory and methods. Over dinner one night, and again in a review of the manuscript, Frank Sullivan of Temple University brought us his rare quality of mind, always reminding us that the story we constructed from our data was only one of the stories we might tell. Steve Fishman of the University of North Carolina at Charlotte, in his careful critique of the manuscript, let us see how a teacher in a discipline outside English would use our study. Hoke Smith of Towson State University read the emerging manuscript several times, bringing to it his powers of analysis, helping us construct our broad theoretical concepts. Barbara Mallonee of Loyola College in Maryland offered constant encouragement throughout the project, and her detailed critique of the manuscript helped us make it more readable.

Dixie Goswami of Clemson University gave us warm and generous support throughout the project, as well as the example of her own work and the work of teacher-researchers whom she has inspired. Bob Wall, of Towson State University, and David Abbott, of Bell Laboratories, helped us with statistical and research techniques. Anne Herrington, of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, and Carol Berkenkotter responded to our research project as panel members at conventions. Many colleagues who attended the L. Ramon Veale Seminar of the National Council of Teachers of English listened to us describe our work and offered useful suggestions—among them were Linda Flower and John R. Hayes, of Carnegie Mellon University. Colleagues in a Baltimore area support group for writing researchers listened and responded; particularly helpful were Joyce Magnotto of Prince George's Community College, Barbara Roswell of Goucher College, and Carolyn Hill and Dan Jones, both of Towson State University. Our thanks, also, to the anonymous reviewers of our manuscript for the National Council of Teachers of English and to the members of the Editorial Board.

The students in the four classes we studied, at Loyola College in Maryland, at Towson State University, and at The College of Notre Dame of Maryland, generously allowed us to eavesdrop as they worked. But more than that, they also worked hard to help us—they toted tape recorders, flipped tapes, dated drafts, marked revisions in different colored pencils, penned their logs at the ends of long days, saved and labeled their work, and submitted to interviews. This study was possible only through their generosity.

Michael Spooner has been a skillful editor, helping us to tighten the manuscript and showing patience when the team process or the complexity of the project caused delays. Project editor Mary Daniels's eye for detail and her tireless energy further helped us tighten the manuscript.

Each of us has had the generous support of spouse and children. We are grateful to our families for their patience and encouragement. And we welcome Billy Gazzam and Margaret Breihan, both of whom were born since we began work on this project.

We have had generous support, too, from our four institutions. Our research was supported by a Faculty Research Fellowship from the University of Maryland, Baltimore County. We also received grants from the Faculty Development Committee and the Dean of Arts and Sciences of Loyola College in Maryland, from the Faculty Research Committee of Towson State University, and from the Academic Dean of the College of Notre Dame of Maryland.